TITLE OF LESSON PLAN:

The Odyssey

LENGTH OF LESSON:

Two class periods

GRADE LEVEL:

9-12

SUBJECT AREA:

Literature

CREDIT:

OBJECTIVES:

Students will understand the following:

1. Literature originally presented in one genre can, with care, be adapted to another genre.
2. Adapters of a literary work into drama must consider dialogue and stage directions.

MATERIALS:

No special materials are needed for this lesson.

PROCEDURE:

1. Introduce the scope of this activity for the Odyssey: Students, working in small groups, will choose, from Books XVII through XX, a section involving two or more characters. They will convert that section into a dramatic scene and act it out.

2. Go over with the class the following important elements of a dramatic scene:

- The script of a scene must contain both dialogue (the conversations and asides of the characters) and stage directions (descriptions of setting, characters, and action). Not all descriptions show up in stage directions, however; sometimes playwrights drop descriptions of setting and of characters right into characters' dialogue.
- A scene usually deals with a single incident, which occurs in a single setting.
- The characters may not resolve a problem in a scene, but a scene must end in a satisfying way rather than simply trail off.

3. In a series of minilessons, as enumerated here, teach or review with students how to proceed from making prewriting notes for a scene, through writing, to revising and editing. Give the groups time to apply each minilesson.

PREWRITING

- As previously mentioned, the scene must have at least two characters. The two characters may be friends or enemies. Each group must select a section of text with a clear beginning and end point—and at least two characters.
- The characters need to have at least one problem or issue to discuss and try to figure out or resolve. Students in each group should note the most important problem or issue in their section of the epic. They should make notes about how to introduce the problem or issue and then how to move it along.
- Each group should imagine how its characters look (including how they dress), sound, and act—and jot down notes for later use.
- Each group must also be clear on where and when the scene takes place, so the students should jot down their thoughts on background scenery, furniture, and props.

WRITING

- When students in each group are ready to move on to the actual drafting stage, let them figure out how multiple authors can work together.
- Introduce the matter of language: Do students want their characters to speak the language as presented in your edition of the Odyssey, or do students want to rewrite the dialogue as contemporary speech?
- Review with the groups, if necessary, the mechanics of listing characters and of writing stage directions and dialogue.

- Advise students to follow Homer's order of events and their own prewriting notes to unfold the scene, introducing characters and the problem or issue, building suspense if appropriate, and winding up at a satisfactory stopping point for the scene. Students should, however, be free to abandon any prewriting notes that may take them to dead ends—and rethink how to dramatize the scene.

- If not earlier, students should now title their scene.

REVISING AND EDITING

Share with students a checklist such as the following, giving them time to revise as necessary so that they can answer yes to all the questions.

- Content

Does the dialogue or stage directions clearly show the character(s) contemplating a problem or an issue?

Does the scene end naturally or artificially?

- Style

Is the dialogue realistic and easy for an actor to say?

- Grammar, Usage, Mechanics

Have you checked to make sure capitalization, spelling, and matters such as agreement, comparison, and pronoun reference are correct?

4. Each group should get a chance to read its adaptation in front of the class. Here are pointers for how to proceed:

- Each student in a group should get a copy of that group's final manuscript.

- Ask a spokesperson for the group to announce to the class the section from Books XVII to XX that the group has adapted.

- Then the members of the group should use their scripts to read the scene for the rest of the class. They may use props during their reading. As appropriate, actors should read or perform stage directions.

5. After each reading, the audience should comment on strengths of the adaptation and areas that were unclear or need improvement.

ADAPTATIONS:

Instead of having small groups working on their own to adapt different sections of the epic, select one section of text for the whole class to work on together—with you. Model for the class how to generate prewriting notes for an adaptation and then how to write the draft itself. Show clearly how you take certain lines of epic poetry and transform them into dialogue or stage directions.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS:

1. Discuss the similarities between the journey of Odysseus and events that have occurred in your own life. Think about the different choices Odysseus is required to make during his journey.
2. Discuss the women in Homer's work. What role do women play in the Odyssey, and how do you think they represent the women of ancient Greece?
3. Explain how the struggles of Odysseus to reach Ithaca are a contest between Poseidon and Athena as well.
4. Select an event from popular culture in which a hero or heroine is placed in a struggle. Examples from movies include Shane, Schindler's List, Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade, Saving Private Ryan, Patch Adams, and Alien. Describe how the director or writer makes you feel toward the hero or heroine and his or her opponents. Compare and contrast this to the characters in the Odyssey.
5. The ancient Greeks truly believed in caring for strangers. Traditional voices in our culture have attempted to continue that tradition by advising all to care for strangers in need and teaching that such assistance is particularly pleasing to God. The media is quick to praise good Samaritans, and civic groups still award medals to humanitarians. But what forces in our time threaten to extinguish this tradition of kindness to and care for strangers? What can we do to care for strangers in need?
6. Revenge as a means of obtaining justice was more acceptable in Homer's society than in our modern society, which has a formidable criminal justice system. Even so, Homer's idea of revenge bears qualification. Define the nature of revenge in the Odyssey that suggests under what conditions it is an acceptable means of justice.

EVALUATION:

You can evaluate each group's scene using the following three-point rubric:

- Three points: contains all key ingredients from the selected section of the text; clearly introduces the problem or issue and develops or resolves it; reads very clearly and in a well-paced manner
- Two points: contains most key ingredients from the selected section of the text; introduces but does not develop the problem or issue; reads clearly in a well-paced presentation of the scene
- One point: omits key ingredients from the selected section of the text; does not focus on a problem or issue; reads poorly

You may ask your students to contribute to the assessment rubric by determining what constitutes a clear and well-paced performance.

EXTENSION:

Modern Monsters

For thousands of years, writers and artists have delighted in Homer's creative cast of monsters and adversaries. Ask your students to imagine a modern-day Odysseus facing a monster who vividly portrays something about the challenges of life in your school or community. Have students write a brief story in which the hero defeats the monster in some creative or witty way. Examples of everyday hazards include cars, buses, exams, sports, romance, drugs, peer pressure, curfew, and so on. When the stories are complete, have your students share them with one another. You may wish to have student artists represent the modern-day monsters for a bulletin board display.

Returning from War

Like Odysseus and his companions, all soldiers have difficulty and sometimes painful transitions when they return home from the battlefield. Have your class research some of the difficulties faced by U.S. troops returning from Vietnam in the early 1970s or from Desert Storm in the early 1990s. Students should compare and contrast these problems with those Odysseus and his men face on their journey home. Students should use their research to write an essay about what problems veterans of war may face and how they cope with such problems.
